Amendment

— having regard to Articles 20 and 47 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union^{1a}, ^{1a} The restriction of the reference to Articles 20 and 47 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union serves to safeguard the core constitutional principles of the Member States. While Articles 20 (equality before the law) and 47 (right to an effective remedy) indisputably guarantee citizens' fundamental rights under the rule of law, Articles 21 and 23 raise significant regulatory and economic concerns. The objective of an outcome-based 'equality' enshrined in Article 23 undermines the well-established principle of merit, by paving the way for state intervention in the labour market and private companies through rigid quota systems. However, the only way to achieve a just society is to ensure legal equality between men and women while at the same time safeguarding private contractual and economic freedom. Furthermore, the extension of far-reaching anti-discrimination criteria within the meaning of Article 21 leads in practice to a disproportionate increase in bureaucratic documentation and evidence requirements for small and medium-sized enterprises (increased red tape), without offering any measurable added value in terms of specific protection against discrimination. In order to ensure a clear distinction between guarantees under the rule of law and market-regulating interventions, the reference to Articles 21 and 23 should be deleted.

^{1a} The term 'gender equality' implies outcome-based quota systems and state intervention that are incompatible with the principle of merit. Constitutional equality is the only effective approach. Furthermore, the EU's missionary aspiration to impose these values on the whole world must be abandoned in favour of pragmatic diplomacy.

^{1a} Promoting women's economic independence is most effectively achieved by strengthening market conditions, systematically reducing bureaucratic hurdles for women entrepreneurs and making targeted use of the digital transformation. A more flexible labour market and the reduction of red tape facilitate autonomous employment models and improve the compatibility of family responsibilities and professional development on the basis of the principle of individual merit. In order to achieve the broadest possible and most crisis-resilient impact, women's economic independence should therefore be promoted through general regulatory relief for small and medium-sized enterprises and in the digital sector, rather than being linked to specific climate policy transformation targets.

w) provide adequate and accessible funding for women's rights organisations;

Amendment

w) call on the Council to ensure that financial resources are made available as a matter of priority and in a targeted manner for the specific protection of women affected by violence and for effective support and counselling for families^{1a};

^{1a} The allocation of public funding should be strictly based on measurable material needs and direct benefits for citizens. Instead of providing flat-rate funding for private organisations and interest groups, financial resources must be earmarked for institutional victim protection – such as the expansion and reliable financing of women's shelters – as well as specific, non-ideological counselling structures for families. This guarantees an efficient and transparent use of taxpayers' money.
