Subject: Food safety and inspection of establishments from the KFC/AmRest chain in the EU

In recent days, worrying information has emerged in the Czech Republic about spoiled meat possibly being served in KFC fast food establishments operated by AmRest. This information indicates a potential threat to consumer health that may affect not only the Czech Republic, but also other Member States where this chain operates.

Given the seriousness of these allegations, which affect both public health and consumer confidence in the European food safety system, I would like to ask the following questions:

1. What steps does the Commission intend to take to investigate this case promptly and ensure that the products sold in KFC/AmRest establishments comply with EU food safety standards?
2. Does the Commission plan to call on the national supervisory authorities of all Member States to carry out thorough and coordinated inspections of the establishments from the KFC chain and similar establishments throughout the EU?
3. Is the Commission considering taking measures to tighten up the monitoring and traceability of meat and other food products within the single market, with a view to preventing such threats to public health from arising in the future?
