to the Commission
Rule 144

Subject: The Commission's position on Huawei

During the meeting of Parliament's LIBE Committee on 23 February 2026, the Commission presented a position pointing out that the first time it had identified Huawei in an official communication as being a high-risk provider in terms of the security of 5G and mobile networks was back in 2020. There was also specific confirmation of this in a Commission document dated 15 June 2023, which stated that 'the Commission takes the view that Huawei and ZTE do indeed pose a significantly higher risk than other 5G suppliers'. Many MEPs took a similar stance during the debate in the LIBE Committee[1].

In the light of the foregoing:

1. Does the Commission still maintain its position that Huawei is a high-risk supplier that poses a threat to the security of data processed within the EU?

2. Was the Commission representative's statement of 23 February 2026 – expressing the view that Huawei is a high-risk supplier – the official position of the Commission?

3. Do the investigations into Huawei that the Member States are currently conducting confirm that Huawei poses a high risk to digital security in the European Union?[2]
