ja) acknowledge that China's emissions have fallen or stalled since 2024, while energy storage capacity has grown significantly past peak demand as a result of large-scale state support and strategic industrial planning; against this background, continue to work together with China in the fight against climate change, and draw lessons from successes and failures in the work towards achieving a just green transition in both China and the EU;

1) acknowledge that overdependencies on Chinese technologies and resources in the area of climate change prevention and green transition also render the EU vulnerable; therefore, strengthen economic security-related actions in the area of green transition; in the light of the fact that China's export of clean/green technologies is largely driven by industrial policy objectives and sustained by excessive state subsidies and export-oriented overcapacity, address the issue of unfair competition for European green-technology industries;

1) acknowledge that overdependencies on Chinese technologies and resources in the area of climate change prevention and green transition render the EU vulnerable and must be addressed; recognise, however, that cooperation with China in the field of green technology remains essential for European companies, given China's position in the production and refining of critical raw materials and in the supply of clean-technology components; call for a balanced approach that combines de-risking and diversification of supply chains with sustained engagement with Beijing on areas of mutual interest, including climate action, renewable energy deployment and green innovation, in order to ensure both the competitiveness of European industries and the achievement of the EU's climate objectives;

p) underscore the geopolitical ramifications of the US-China trade conflict and its potential spillover effects on the EU economy; actively shape the EU's Indo-Pacific and Asian partnerships by coordinating with like-minded actors, and seek closer alignment with them on trade, technology standards and supply chain resilience to work around China's monopoly in critical areas; seize the opportunity for the EU to present itself as a reliable and desirable partner in the Indo-Pacific and emphasise that increased cooperation with like-minded partners is essential in the light of the instrumentalisation by China of rare earth minerals and the need for the EU to diversify its suppliers of critical raw materials to ensure resilient supply chains; in this regard, welcome the signing between the EU and Australia of the Strategic Partnership on sustainable critical and strategic minerals; stress the need for the EU to invest in the R&D and innovation ecosystem to avoid technological dependency;

Paragraph 1 – point aw a (new)

Motion for a resolution

Amendment

awa) encourage the Commission and the Member States to systematically analyse China's experience in long-term economic planning, industrial policy and large-scale public investment, with a particular focus on strengthening Europe's industrial base and strategic autonomy, ensuring energy security and greater energy independence, accelerating the development and deployment of artificial intelligence and other key technologies, and driving the ecological and energy transition; call for this assessment to inform a more proactive and strategic EU economic policy framework, capable of mobilising public investment, supporting high-value industrial production and quality employment, reducing strategic dependencies, and delivering the Green Deal and technological transformation while strengthening social cohesion, rather than remaining constrained by a narrow neoliberal approach;
